Strauss Believes Trip To Israel Helped To Improve Relations Between It And West Germany And To Aid Mid-East Peace; Looks To Exchange Of Envoys

Franz Josef Strauss, former Defense Minister of West Germany, on his return from a controversial visit to Israel, called for West Germany to exchange ambassadors with that country. "The establishment of diplomatic relations with Israel would be an act of historic restitution," the leader of the Bavarian branch of Chancellor Adenauer's Government party said, reports the New York Times. Mr. Strauss said he understood the Chancellor was considering his proposal seriously.

The German Federal Republic and Israel have had elaborate official contacts in the last decade related to the execution of a $700,000,000 restitution and compensation agreement signed in 1953.

Under that agreement Israel established a purchasing mission in nearby Cologne, staffed in part by professional diplomats. A number of Israeli officials, including Defense Minister Shimon Peres, have been quietly received at Bonn in recent years.

Bonn, however, has shrunk from an exchange of ambassadors out of concern for the reaction of Arab governments. It has been feared that diplomatic recognition of Israel would move Arab states to retaliate by establishing diplomatic ties with the East German Communist regime.

Mr. Strauss said that Bonn should stop worrying about Arab reactions. He said an exchange of ambassadors with Jerusalem could not be considered an anti-Arab move, pointing out that the Soviet Union has a big embassy in Jerusalem even as it delivers armaments to the United Arab Republic.

"We cannot let others decide what we should do," said the former Defense Minister.

The outspoken Bavarian politician, who has a talent for controversy at home and abroad, undertook a private visit to Israel last month against the advice of more cautious colleagues, says the New York Times. He returned with public opinion largely swung to his side.

He said he believed his trip had helped to improve relations between the two peoples and had contributed to the normalization of relations between Israel and West Germany. Mr. Strauss asserted that he had hardly noticed demonstrations against him by Israeli groups. He offered the opinion that protests against his appearance were motivated primarily by internal political considerations.

The former Defense Minister, dismissed last November because he had caused the arrest of four journalists he considered guilty of disclosing military secrets, said he had continued regular contacts with Israeli officials on security questions. He declined to enumerate any specific agreements.

It is persistently asserted that Bonn has rendered substantial military aid to the Israelis in recent years. The help has presumably been channeled through France, which openly renders such support.

Mr. Strauss said that Bonn should "make its political influence felt" to help maintain peace in the Middle East. "However, it is not possible for the Federal Republic to participate directly in the security efforts of Israel," he said.

Discussing the work of rocket scientists from West Germany in the United Arab Republic, Mr. Strauss said his Christian Socialist party would support legislation to forbid such activity unless it had Government approval.

He said the work of the German scientists "should not be over-estimated," says the New York Times. The bombardment rockets developed in the United Arab Republic were fitted out with a "poor electronic-guidance system," he added.

Franz Josef Strauss, former West German Defense Minister, left Israel stating that he was "deeply impressed" with the achievements there. His departure was as quiet as his arrival ten days before on a visit at the invitation of Premier David Ben-Gurion, says the New York Times.

"I was deeply impressed," Mr. Strauss said, "by the initiative and the spirit of sacrifice I observed everywhere in the build-up of the country and in the development of the land."

He also commended Israel for her system of collective farm settlements, industry, scientific and technological progress, and the performance of the army and air force.

He expressed his gratitude to the Israeli population for greeting him "correctly and in a very friendly way." Israeli officials suggested that "friendly" was not exactly the attitude of the majority of Israelis toward the Strauss visit. However, they said most Israelis understood the necessity for such visits as part of the developing relations between Israel and West Germany.

Three faces in a newspaper cartoon seemed to tell more of Israel's ambivalent attitude toward contemporary Germany than all that has been said and done recently in the public forum. This attitude again lends itself to scrutiny because of the visit to Israel of Franz Josef Strauss, the controversial former West German Defense Minister. Two of the faces in the cartoon, by Dosh, for the newspaper Maariv, have been crossed out. One of them depicts an angrily shouting man, the other a broadly smiling man.

Between the two is Dosh's symbolic Israeli, a snub-nosed youngster with forehead curl sprouting out from under the brim of his cloth kibbutz hat. The expression on his face is of passive resignation. The cartoon caption reads "Facing the visitor."

The attitude of the average Israeli reflects both the politically realistic policy of conciliation with Germany personified by Premier David Ben-Gurion, says the New York Times, and the highly emotional anti-German view personified by Menachem Begin, leader of Herut, the conservative nationalist opposition party.

Mr. Ben-Gurion effectively appeals to Israeli pragmatism when he contends that Israel's vital interests prohibit the spurning of any friendly hand, particularly if that hand is proffered by one of Europe's major powers and a close partner of the nation that Israel considers her best friend — France.

That this hand bears a historic stain of Jewish persecution does not change the real-politic of the situation in which Israel finds herself, in the view of the Premier.

But for Mr. Begin that stain is everything. The Herut leader's most effective argument, because it answers to the sub-conscious suspicions of many Israelis, is that the basic German character has undergone a change of form but not of substance since the days of Hitler.

That the Israeli Army has had to drop the letters "SS" from its new French-built anti-tank rocket, the SS-11, demonstrates the lasting potency of the dark legacy, left by Hitler to Europe's surviving Jews. The SS was the Nazi's élite guard organization.

What weakens the advocacy by Mr. Ben-Gurion and Mr. Begin of the respective positions is that the former has a tendency to go too far and the latter not to go far enough.

For many Israelis the methods employed last fall by Mr. Strauss against the news magazine, Der Spiegel (The Mirror), that led to his forced resignation were only too reminiscent of Hitler's epoch. The magazine had criticized West Germany's defense system. Its publisher and a number of his editors and reporters were arrested on suspicion of treason.

Furthermore, the timing of the visit so soon after the disclosure of the activities of German rocket experts in the United Arab Republic, says the New York Times, which led to an acrimonious internal political squabble and the resignation of Israel's chief security officer, seemed unpropopitious.

Consequently many Israelis felt that the Strauss visit properly could and should have been put off for a time without in any way harming the country's relations with West Germany.

The Premier was obdurate, which, in the view of many, would have been all right if he had limited himself to stressing West Germany's and Mr. Strauss' undeniably important contributions to Israel's security and to the advancement of her foreign and economic policies in Western Europe.

But this was not enough for Mr. Ben-Gurion. First, he insulted the Herut party in a manner that many thought gratuitous by recalling that members of Herut's predecessor movement, the Revisionists, had 30 years ago "glorified" Hitler as a model leader for a nationalist movement.

Then, in rejecting a request by a former Nazi prisoner's association that the Strauss visit be canceled, the Premier implied that distrust of Germany based on emotions did not constitute valid grounds for opposing his conciliation policy and even smacked of the very racialism that characterized the Hitler regime.

Thus baited, the Opposition led by Herut, sought unsuccessfully to harness anti-German sentiment to discredit the Government and to mount demonstrations against Mr. Strauss.

Caught by contradictory tugging of Mr. Ben-Gurion's pragmatism and Mr. Begin's emotionalism is Dosh's symbolic Israeli, who is, as one Israeli put it, says the New York Times, "like the little boy who doesn't like the taste of the medicine but knows he has to take it."

Basel Prosecutor Justifies Act Of Israeli In Case Of Threat To German Scientist In Egypt

The Basel, Switzerland, public prosecutor said that an Israeli accused of having threatened the daughter of a West German scientist working in the United Arab Republic acted with justified concern for his country.

The prosecutor, Hans Wieland, asked that the alleged agent, Josef Ben Gal, 33 years old, be given a three-month suspended sentence and that his alleged accomplice, Otto Joklik, an Austrian nuclear scientist, be fined and given a 100-day suspended sentence, says the New York Times. Summing up the prosecution case in the trial of the two men, Mr. Wieland said that Mr. Ben Gal's understandable concern and his love for his country must be considered in his favour.

Both men pleaded innocent to the charge of attempted coercion. They are accused of threatening Heidi Goercke in an attempt to stop her father, Paul Goercke, an electronics expert, from working on rockets for Egypt.

As Mr. Wieland spoke, Mr. Ben Gal sat facing the judges, his back toward the public and the press gallery. Throughout the trial only the judges, lawyers and court officials have seen his face. The prosecutor said that Mr. Ben Gal had made massive and intensive threats against Miss Goercke, but that his motives could not be considered dishonorable.

He said: "I do not pretend to know what is happening in Egypt, but the activity of these German scientist has quite understandably created the deepest concern. This is not just an Israeli-Egyptian affair, but it is of concern to the whole world."

Dr. Joklik testified that he himself had stopped working for Egypt and had left the country when he learned that Egypt's rockets were intended for use against Israel. He said that Egypt planned to contaminate the air over Israel with radioactive cobalt 60 and strontium 90.

The testimony was given by Austrian-born Dr. Otto Joklik, aged 42 years, at the opening of his trial on charges of acting as an Israeli agent and trying to coerce West German scientists to stop rocket development work for President Nasser's government.

"These projects go far beyond the defense requirements (of Egyptians)," said Dr. Joklik, a former German army officer. "They constitute a deadly threat to Israel and other states, even a threat to European cities. The whole enterprise is nothing but a continuation of the extermination of the Jews."

The newspaper, Maariv, said that the Egyptian Army had failed in attempts to buy radioactive cobalt 60 and strontium 90 from West Germany or anywhere else, says the New York Times. The report quoted "reliable Israeli sources."

"This case is an iceberg, with only a small part showing in the indictment," an informed Israeli said. "Unless the cork interferes, the rest of the iceberg will emerge," reports the New York Herald Tribune. Dr. Joklik told the court he left a well-paying job in Cairo because he became convinced that Egypt was preparing radioactive aggressive weapons against Israel and he did not want to have anything to do with such plans.

Defense Attorney Georges Brunschvig submitted documents purporting to show that Egypt had bought enough radioactive cobalt 60 to contaminate all of Israel for five years. He said the documents were invoices which proved the purchases of massive amounts of the radioactive materials.

Dr. Joklik told the court he had a hand in these purchases before breaking with Cairo. He said the invoices were correct.

Mr. Brunschvig also introduced a letter allegedly written by Prof. Wolfgang Pilz, reported chief of foreign scientists working on rockets for Egypt, which mentioned consignments of 400 and 500 rockets. "It should be clear that a total of 900 rockets is by no means destined for space research," the attorney said. "These rockets have other purposes."

The two defendants were arrested March 2 in Zurich and charged with "attempted coercion" in trying to get Miss Heidi Goercke, aged 24 years, to go to Cairo to persuade her father, rocket expert, Paul Goerke, to quit working for Col. Nasser.

The prosecution said Miss Goercke was lured from her home in Freiburg, in West Germany, to a Basel hotel, reports the New York Herald Tribune, and then threatened with "grave consequences" for her father if she did not follow instructions from Ben-Gal.

Miss Goercke, looking pale and nervous, testified that Dr. Joklik told her that Israeli agents would kill her father if he did not abandon his work. Dr. Joklik sharply denied her statement. She flew from Cairo to attend the trial. She was accompanied by her brother, Rainer, 21, who was with her during the March 2 meeting with the two accused in the hotel.

The Egyptian build-up of aircraft and rocket power with the assistance of European, mainly West German, scientists has created great anxiety in Israel in the last few months. In April it was reported that 600 Europeans were aiding Cairo in this work.

Orthodox Prayer Book Issued in English, Hebrew Braille

The first Orthodox Jewish Prayerbook issued in English and Hebrew Braille, containing daily, Sabbath and festival prayers, is now available, it was announced by Mrs. Harry J. Finke, president of the Jewish Braille Institute of America. This achievement in having the Orthodox Prayerbook and Siddur transcribed in the form which the sightless can "read" makes it possible for the Orthodox Jewish blind to join sighted members of their congregations in Orthodox synagogues throughout the world.

Issued by the Institute in five volumes of encyclopedia-size, the Orthodox Prayerbooks in braille are gifts of the United States and Canadian affiliates of the Women's Branch of the Union of Orthodox Jewish Congregations of America. The volumes will be distributed to the Jewish blind throughout the United States, Canada, Israel, and other countries. The project was made possible through the leadership of Mrs. Isidor Freedman, honorary president of the Women's Branch and chairman of its Braille Prayerbook Committee; Mrs. Emanuel Lazar, president of the Women's Branch; and Mrs. Allen J. Edles, past president.

The Braille Edition of the Prayerbook and Siddur follows the Orthodox Prayerbook of the Rabbinical Council of America, edited and translated by Rabbi David de Sola Poole. It was transcribed into braille by Mrs. Irving Weingart, of Des Moines, Iowa, under the direction of Rabbi Charles B. Chavel, chairman of the Prayerbook Committee of the Rabbinical Council of America.

Headquarters of the Jewish Braille Institute is at 48 East 74th Street, New York, where it maintains a free circulating library of more than 15,000 braille volumes and an extensive collection of full-length recorded "talking books." It publishes the Jewish Braille Review, a monthly literary magazine, and also issues Hebrew-English braille prayerbooks and the Bible in Hebrew braille. English and Hebrew braille texts are given to Jewish blind children attending religious schools.

Brothers Give $500,000 To Brandeis U. For Communication Research

Brandeis University announced the receipt of a grant of $500,000 to underwrite and expand its recently created Communication Research Institute on its Waltham, Mass., campus. To be named the Lester S. and Alfred L. Morse Communication Research Institute in honor of the donors, the Institute will continue its operations from offices on the Brandeis campus under the direction of Louis Cowan, former president of CBS Television. Alfred and Lester Morse are president and director, and chairman of the board, respectively, of Morse Shoe, Inc., Boston, Mass. The company is the seventh largest retailer of shoes in the United States, operating 259 stores from coast to coast, including Canada.

The year-old Communication Research Institute already has opened wide-ranging programs of sponsored research, institutes, and publications to explore the burgeoning importance of communications media upon every aspect of contemporary life, social structure, political organization, international relations, education and the formation of individual and group attitudes. In 1962, the Institute, under joint sponsorship with the U.S. State Department, launched a pilot project which brought together 28 representatives of 16 nations to compare notes on broadcasting as a teaching tool. Experts from Europe, Scandinavia, and Japan met with their counterparts from Africa and the Orient where illiteracy and multi-language cultures form a teaching barrier to technological advance.

Participants in the four-month program, known as the Multi-National Communications Specialists Seminar, were selected following a globe-circling journey by Henry Morgenthau, 3rd., associate director of the Institute, along with a State Department representative. The foreign specialists worked with members of the Brandeis University faculty for six weeks to gain an understanding of American government, culture, economics, and history while participating in seminars with American broadcasting officials on technical aspects of the field. For eight weeks they took on-the-job training at stations throughout the nation before returning to campus for an evaluation of their findings and a trip to Washington for a concluding meeting with Newton Minow, of the FCC.

New York City, the National Educational Television Network, the Agency for International Development, the Voice of America, and the University of Ife, West Nigeria, have been the principal beneficiaries of other projects conducted under the Research Institute. In the months ahead the Morse Institute will play host to a major study of the economics of educational television and once again join with the U.S. State Department in sponsoring an international seminar on broadcasting, similar to the 1962 project.

Alfred L. Morse, who resides at Buckminster Road, Brookline, Mass., with his wife, Mrs. Annette Morse, earned his Bachelor of Science degree in economics at the University of Pennsylvania. Among his affiliations are the National Association of Shoe Chain Stores, of which he was founding director and past president, and is currently a director; the National Shoe Institute, and the Combined Jewish Philanthropies, both of which he is a trustee. He is a past trustee of the 210 Associates, and is also affiliated with the Committee of 1000, at the University of Pennsylvania, and with the Belmont and Coonamessett Country Clubs.

Lester S. Morse received his education at Dartmouth College, and Boston University. He was past president and treasurer of the Belmont Country Club, and a past trustee of the Francis Ouimet Scholarship Fund. He is also a trustee of the Combined Jewish Philanthropies. With his wife, Mrs. Ruth Morse, he lives on Buckminster Road, Brookline, Mass.

U. S. Senator Ribicoff Is Self-Made Politician

One spring morning in 1961, The Hartford Courant carried a front-page picture that proved, in the estimate of some observers, to be worth not 1,000 words but 220,000 votes. It showed an empty chair at a $100 dinner that Connecticut Democrats had given the night before for three of their leaders who had made good on the New Frontier, says the New York Times. Present at the affair had been John M. Bailey, the new national chairman, and Chester Bowles, the new Under Secretary of State.

The empty chair had been held for the third guest of honor, Abraham Alexander Ribicoff. He had been too busy at the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to get back to Hartford.

The next year, when the former Governor returned to run for the Senate, the people gave him a wobbly 27,000-vote majority, a comedown from the record-breaking 246,000 majority he had amassed running for re-election as Governor only four years before.

It was typical of Mr. Ribicoff, however, that he accepted this faint endorsement with aplomb, moving into his Senate seat with the same effortless urbanity and self-confidence that had become the hallmarks of his political career.

Senator Ribicoff's very recent floor speech on education represented an attempt to break the political impasse over Federal aid to schools and colleges under religious supervision. It was a problem he had been unable to solve as a Cabinet member.

The public life of this handsome, graying son of a Polish immigrant has involved reliance on a shifting complex of political support—Democratic, independent, nonpartisan, even Republican—ever since his days as a teen-age zipper salesman in the midwest. "I've never run away from my Democracy," Mr. Ribicoff said recently, "but, on the other hand, I've never taken a doctrinaire position."

Connecticut's junior Senator was born April 9, 1910, in a tenement on Star Street in New Britain, where his father was a factory worker. He recalls his boyhood as one of severe poverty, says the New York Times. He worked as a paper boy, caddy, milkman's helper, gasoline pumper, clerk and road construction worker.

After high school he worked for a year in a zipper and buckle factory, earning enough to pay a year's tuition at New York University. He then left college to become the zipper company's Chicago representative. He was 19 years old.

Going to the University of Chicago nights, he accumulated enough credits to enter its law school. He won a scholarship, quit his salesman's job and was graduated cum laude in 1933.

Mr. Ribicoff moved immediately into Democratic politics while practicing law in Hartford. Five years later, at the age of 28, he was elected to the Lower House of the State Legislature and served two two-year terms.

He likes to recall that the Capitol press corps voted him the "most promising" legislator his freshman year and the "most able" two years later.

Mr. Ribicoff had what he now describes as a "falling out" with Democratic state leaders in the early 1940's over party discipline. When the 1948 election looked pretty desperate to the Democrats, they over-looked past differences and persuaded Mr. Ribicoff to run for the House of Representatives in a then Republican district. He won.

After two terms in the House and his Senate loss, Mr. Ribicoff defeated the incumbent Governor, John Davis Lodge, by 3,200 votes in 1954. Four years later his re-election margin set an all-time Connecticut record.

The Senator and his wife, the former Miss Ruth Siegel, live in Washington and maintain a home in New London. Their son, Peter Ribicoff, is a high school history teacher in San Francisco; their daughter, Miss Jane Ribicoff, a social service worker in New York City, says the New York Times.

Mr. Ribicoff plays golf, with a creditable handicap of 18. He also reads for recreation. He hasn't had the time to practice any law for nearly 10 years.

Leivik, The Poet, In The D.P. Camps As U.N.R.R.A. Officer

BY DAVID WOLPE

It was the end of March, 1946. Leivik is coming! The news spread like wildfire. The words were carried from mouth to mouth. Like a magnet this message touched us — the surviving Jewish writers who were then in Germany.

As it happened, I had the honour, at that time, to be the general secretary of the Organisation of Jewish Writers and Artists, and I recall with what interest, anticipation and tension, and above all with what love, we awaited his coming. We felt that he was the man for the mission — to visit the camps of the remnants of Jewry.

We felt how privileged we were to have him in our midst, but later it was Leivik who persistently stressed the fact that the privilege was his, to be in our midst. He even tried to tell us how he would have liked to achieve the position of being the least amongst us. He wanted to identify himself with our woe and our sorrow, in order to be able to say to himself, "I too, am one of the remnant." And he sought, as far as possible, to erase the differences between us . . .

And here is my first memory of him. We clasp his hand and hear his voice. I cast my mind backwards — 17 years — and see him so clearly in retrospect: a man in an UNRRA officer's uniform, slight in stature and resting upon those slight shoulders a snowy-white head, as though sparks were darting from it. This was my first momentary impression and it has persisted with me.

I don't now know whether this is an exact portrait of the physical Leivik, but the impression has remained. Later I saw the broad forehead, the deep penetrating, searching blue eyes, the ascetic, pale face with the thin, tightly-shut lips and the sharp-pointed chin. On meeting Leivik one was struck by his immaculateness. This harmonised with his whole personality and stirred the association one had had of the spiritual Leivik — clean, honest, "the conscience of Yiddish literature."

When I think of him in retrospect, I feel that he was encircled by a spiritual aura, like the quality of light. The longing for the realisation of his Geulah dream enlarged his horizons, and in their light he moved and had his being.

During the six weeks of his visit to the camps in Germany he moved about in anguish and rage. Anguish for the fate of European Jewry, rage against the murderers. He brought to us his compassion, his understanding and his brotherly love. He longed to find an echo in the hearts of the stricken Jews. He prepared specific subjects for his addresses, but as a rule he abandoned his set themes and yielded to his mood and thoughts of the moment. His addresses were effusions from heart to heart.

During his short stay in Germany he became for the Jewish inmates of the camps a friend and a brother to whom one could open up one's heart and pour out one's woe, in order to find a little relief for oneself in the telling. The tragedy of the holocaust entered his very being: and he felt that the Jews of the camps were his brothers by an edict of destiny.

There were those in the camps who did not think of all Jews as martyrs, and they told Leivik so. They told him of the traitors and the Kapos in the ghettos. Leivik was deeply depressed by these stories about Jews who had lent themselves to be the Nazis' henchmen. But he did not stand in judgment upon them. "Who can tell," he said, "whether anyone can pass judgment upon such people under such circumstances?"

The guilt lay upon the Nazis and his abhorrence of the Germans in the camps was such that he avoided them most scrupulously and did not wish to be anywhere near them. His disgust and contempt for them made itself felt. I recall how a friend and I accompanied him during the first few days of his stay in Munich.

In Bavaria the Germans were wearing short summer trousers of a certain type of leather, and there was a tradition that the shabbier the trousers were the greater their worth. An old German in shorts, with white exposed legs was walking in our direction. Leivik stared at the unsightly figure and exclaimed: "It is the likes of this that murdered my people!"

As far as it was possible, Leivik brought hope and courage to the camp inmates. He seemed to have mustered untold strength to speak, to help, to travel from one camp to the next, and to listen to ever new nightmare stories of suffering. Although he looked physically frail and weak there seemed to emanate from him a supernatural strength, and wherever he moved amongst the survivors his fellow-feeling and interest evoked trust.

And so, in a short time, he managed to meet and have contact with a large number of people. There was never a complaint that he was tired and that he was doing too much.

In particular he was interested in the surviving Jewish writers and their needs. One episode stands out clearly. He asked me to come to see him. He was living in a suburb of Munich, in a quarter which was built during the Nazi years for their officials. The place was occupied by UNRRA personnel of the American Military Command. Here with Leivik stayed also his companion, the Hebrew poet, Israel Effrat.

I entered his room. It was half in darkness. Heavy curtains hung on the windows, which let in a little sunny spring air. The room was very modestly furnished: there were two iron camp beds and I saw Leivik sitting on the edge of one of them, entering notes in his notebook.

"It's good you've come," he said. "Sit down. It's days since I've made notes of what I've seen and heard and I'll forget," he apologised.

"I've got time," I said, "I'll wait."

I sat down and noticed the speed and the nervous energy with which he was writing. When he raised his eyes to me he said, "Only yesterday I heard a gruesome tale about a Kapo which I have just noted down." Quietly I asked him whether he intended to write something about this.

"God forbid!" he said. "How can I write about this? Am I God that I should stand in judgment? There was enough heroism in the ghettos, why concentrate on the sinful . . . And I'm not even sure if they were sinful. Perhaps many more in their place would have behaved likewise."

"But their treachery was an expression of their character," I said. "There must have been some predisposition to such behaviour." I noticed a disapproving expression on his face and felt it was better to change the subject. "You asked me to come and see you, Chaver Leivik," I said.

"Yes," he replied. "I wanted to ask you if you need a few dollars." He seemed to feel uncomfortable and shook his snow-white head, noticing that I was deeply surprised. "After all, we are . . . People can't go on living like this," he said.

"I don't need anything. But what do you mean by living like this?"

To which he replied: "One has to move amongst people. One has to present a decent front."

"I don't understand," I said. "Inwardly I am whole, the rest are only externals. What is it you disapprove of amongst us?"

Leivik replied: "On the contrary, I am impressed by your courage, your pride, your endurance," he said, accentuating each word, and adding: "But on the other hand the Remnant here is without everything and I've come to help in whatever way I can. To live like this is to live with the physical outlook of yesterday. You must live like free men. For example, look at your shoes. Don't be angry with me. Can one go amongst people looking like this? You must have new shoes, you must have money."

Instinctively I dropped my gaze to my feet and blushed. I was touched by Leivik's fatherly care for me. "I don't care about this", I said sharply, in order to divert his gaze from me. "You must care!" he exclaimed peremptorily, and rose.

I was sorry at the tone of his voice and I sought to calm him. "Excuse me," I said, "the problems here are so many and so vast, but your thought for me is an honour and I thank you."

He mused for a moment and said: "There is much for me to endure here but I do it with love." And then added, reproachfully: "One of your crowd — one of the writers, has accused me of having no ahavat Yisroel. Have you ever heard anything quite like this! But I don't want to justify myself. Please take the twenty-five dollars."

When I left him and went downstairs from the third storey of the building there swept before my

A Review Of "The Deed", By Gerold Frank

BY RUTH GRUBER, IN THE NEW YORK HERALD TRIBUNE

Without judging, writing with suspense and compassion, Gerold Frank has recreated the story of two young Jewish boys from Palestine who slipped into Cairo in 1944 and murdered Lord Moyne, the highest British official in the Middle East. Even if the book were not true, and it is agonizingly true, it would be a genuine literary work. Its style, lyrical, and brooding, deceptively simple, builds the story like a novel of suspense. The character of the two boys, about whom almost nothing has been known, emerges as Frank explores their past, their motives, their strength, and restless despair, their resentment that the British were keeping the Jews out of the homeland at the very moment Hitler was burning them in gas chambers.

What was "The Deed"? The deed was murder. The deed was assassination to awaken the conscience of the world to the life and death struggle between a colonial power and a people longing for their own land. Was it justified? Morally? Psychologically ! Politically? Franks draws no conclusions. He does not over-build his case; he does not declare that this act of murder helped to give birth to the State of Israel. For the judgment of history he sets forth the facts. Even the British are not villains here, they merely played the colonial role that they had to play. Nor are the so-called terrorists portrayed as villains, though they were fighting not only the British rule but their own organized and responsible Jewish community.

Frank, who covered the trial of the two boys in Cairo, was to be haunted by them for nearly twenty years until he finally wrote their epitaph. He retraced their steps. He talked with their families, their friends, and even their executioner. He walked on the Rue Shagaret el Dorf in Cairo where the deed was done; he stood on the Bulak Bridge where the two Eliahus, Eliahu Hakim (17) and Eliahu Bet Zouri (22), tried to escape; he revisited the courtroom where the words of the boys still rang in his ears . . . "Not mercy, but justice we demand . . ." Or their answer to the lawyer who begged them to plead temporary insanity. "Our deed was not an emotional accident. We did it carefully, with premeditation. It was a political act carried out for moral purposes. If we risked our lives, it was because it was an important deed."

Frank places the deed in the context of the times. The deed was committed at the moment of the greatest disaster in Jewish history. While Hitler was murdering six million Jews, Britain was barring even the handful who escaped from landing in Palestine. The refugees on the S.S. Patria reached Haifa to be told the British were deporting them; they blew up their own ship. Young Eliahu Hakim stood on his verandah watching the British fish up their headless bodies with fishhooks. Later in Cairo, the boys' Egyptian defense counsel, appointed by the court, was to remind the world that if these refugees had been Nazi Germans, they would have been allowed to land and would have been interned.

Just before Passover, when Jews commemorate delivery from slavery in Egypt, the two Eliahus were hanged in Egypt. That evening the Egyptian Director General of Prisons told a Jewish professor at the University of Cairo: "I saw two young lions die today . . . I have seen nothing like it before. They were very near to God all the time. They were in a high world, My Professor. They went to their death clean, clean as white candlewax."

And in another section of Cairo, the Egyptian hangman told the physician who had come to attend his wife: "As you are a Jew and a doctor, I can speak to you. This is the first execution in twenty years in which I had the impression that I am a criminal for what I do. . . . Such courage they showed, such bearing. . . . I heard their singing before I approached their cell. Their rabbi was there, seeking to comfort them, and when they comforted him, he, too wept."

"The Deed" is a compelling document of political assassination. It is a three-dimensional study of the road along which two young and pure idealists moved almost inexorably toward murder of a man they had never seen until the moment they took his life. It is an important book for every student and historian searching to understand the resistance movement in Palestine, particularly the Irgun Zvai Leumi and the tiny Stern Group to which the two Eliahus belonged. It is a guidepost explaining how a handful of youngsters in any country might begin to regard terror as their only effective weapon against an occupying power equipped with machine guns, tanks, great armies, and secret police, shooting, murdering, hideously torturing in the name of the law.

Yet it is not an angry book. It is written without violence or hatred or consuming passion. This is Gerold Frank's best book; and perhaps all the other books he has written, books on Israel in collaboration with Bartley C. Crum and Jorge Garcia-Granados, and more recent books with self-destroying women like Lillian Roth and Diana Barrymore, were fertile training ground in understanding the two boys. He has written of their brief life and their single deed with quiet dignity and restraint, with sensitivity and consummate skill, always probing, always asking how it was that all the players, British colonial servants, Jewish resistance fighters, anguished Jewish leaders did what they had to do in this epic tragedy played out not in ancient heroic Greece but in the Middle East in our time.

It is a book for all people who love life, and love freedom more. It is a book not to be forgotten.

Message From The American Jewish Committee Mourns The Death Of A Friend

The American Jewish Committee cabled the following message to Amleto Giovanni Cardinal Cicognani, Papal Secretary of State, on the death of his Holiness Pope John XXIII. Similar messages were sent to five U.S. Cardinals.

"The American Jewish Committee joins in the universal mourning over the death of Pope John XXIII. In the brief five years of his Papacy, he has given extraordinary personal leadership that has significantly transformed and improved human relationships in such an historic way that this may well constitute his greatest living monument. His great personal humanity, his overwhelming charity, and his love for the human person have endeared him and have won the universal respect of men of all races, religions, and points of view. It is obvious from the anxiety that men everywhere have felt during his recent illness that he was regarded as a friend and leader by many who are outside his own religious tradition. Jewish history will regard Pope John as one of the righteous among the nations of the earth who earned a place in the world to come."

The concern of Jews throughout the world had been reflected earlier in the numerous messages received in Rome by the Vatican's Secretary of State, from Jewish communities and leaders in many countries.

OPEN LETTER TO THE JEWISH WAR VETERANS

BY LEONARD B. SUSSMAN, OF NEW YORK, EXECUTIVE DIRECTOR OF THE AMERICAN COUNCIL FOR JUDAISM

The Jewish War Veterans has issued a defamatory statement concerning The American Council for Judaism and the status of Jews in the Soviet Union. The Jewish War Veterans is apparently seeking to offset the handicap of its pro-Zionism. The United States Government, through the Justice Department and other agencies, is increasing its surveillance of the American Zionist Council. The Jewish War Veterans obviously wants to claim it is not a foreign agent, as Zionism is increasingly regarded.

The Council has never taken a position on the status of Soviet Jews. We have not because we are, as an organization, principally concerned with the problems of Americans of Jewish faith. We adhere strictly to the terms of our charter. On occasion, when we believe that activities of other Jewish organizations in the United States are harming the status of Jews elsewhere, we do state our opinions. In the Soviet situation, the efforts of the World Zionist Organization and its American subsidiaries, may well be undermining the security of Soviet Jews.

Pro-Zionist groups such as the Jewish War Veterans, joined in the effort, are equally guilty of exploiting the tenuous status of Soviet Jews for the primary goal of the Zionist movement: "ingathering" of all Jews in Israel.

The American Council for Judaism, by its title, its charter, its history and the personal records of its founders and officers, is incontestably committed to assisting the United States Government in defense of Free World ideals and interests. Nothing the JWV can say or, in cowardice, imply can alter the public record of Council leaders in this regard. That does not mitigate the guilt of the JWV in making a McCarthy-like, guilt-by-association attack. By its method alone, the JWV stands self-convicted.

However, the issue opened by the JWV deserves examination. For the JWV has taken a year-old speech of mine and attacked it out of context. This was apparently done because the JWV, in military terms, sorely needs a diversionary action to cover its activities on behalf of the Zionist-Israel sovereignty.

The facts in the Soviet issue are these:

In my single speech one year ago, I indicated clearly my opposition to the anti-religious policy of the Soviet. I expressed concern, however, lest the Zionist-Israel attempt to secure greater manpower for Israel backfire and sink Soviet Jews deeper into the Soviet mire. Obviously, in an authoritarian government such as the Soviet Union, any group that is believed to be tied to another nationality is immediately suspected.

Knowing this, the Israel Government and the World Zionist Organization, which is a quasi-governmental arm of the Israel Government, persist in demanding permission for 3,000,000 Russian Jews to go to Israel. This is established Zionist policy, the "ingathering" of all Jews ultimately in Israel. American Jews are also on the list of ultimate, expected arrivals en masse in Israel!

To advance this campaign, the Zionist movement began whipping up a propaganda drive several years ago, based on the obvious antipathy of the Soviet to all religionists. The Soviet's criticism and suspicion of its Jews is deepened, however, by the very Zionist campaign that is cynically said to be interested in saving these Soviet Jews. No Zionist or pro-Zionist group such as the JWV can possibly aid Soviet Jews, and they know it! But by attacking the Soviet they appear to be on the side of the righteous.

My speech one year ago was based exclusively on material supplied by the U.S. Department of State and by one of the best known American specialists on the Soviet Union. The issue, then as now, is not the ups and downs of the status of Soviet Jews. The real issue is the motive of organizations like the JWV in pushing the campaign so hard. The answer now becomes clear:

There is a growing crisis in the Middle East. American policy, admirably stated by President Kennedy on May 8, calls for a neutralist role as between Israel and the Arab states. We are morally committed to maintain Israel against military liquidation. That is clear and is as it should be. However, this does not commit up to support Israeli or Arab interests as a matter of American policy. We, as Americans of Jewish faith, want our government's hand free to act in America's interest in this highly sensitive area. We have no commitment, as Jews, different from any other Americans.

Where does the Jewish War Veterans stand? Where was the JWV when the President of the United States declared it to be in the interest of the country to oppose the military attacks by Israel in 1956? Where did the JWV stand when the United States policy in its own interest and that of the Western World, supported the censure of Israel in its attack on Syria in 1963? What is the JWV doing today, when President Kennedy tries to steer a neutral course in the Middle East, in defense of American interests?

In all these cases, and in countless others, the JWV is committed to support of the Zionist-Israel position. This policy has persisted for fifteen years no matter what the particular incident or problem at issue.

The American Council for Judaism has no policy on the substance of any of these political matters. We maintain our commitment to take the religious group known as Jews out of the political and diplomatic arena, as Jews. We, as Jews, have no different commitments in the foreign field than any other Americans. The vast body of U.S. Jews agree, but they are being ill-served by organizations such as the JWV which persist in creating the false impression that Americans of Jewish faith, or even sizable numbers of them, have automatic rights in, or responsibilities to, the State of Israel.

Yes, we help the citizens of Israel philanthropically. We want to see them secure and prosperous. But that is vastly different from sharing their political destiny or solving their political problems. Neither they nor we should want that!

The Jewish War Veterans does not support this exclusively American position. That is why it seeks now to drag in the laughable and patently false bogy of The Council and the Soviet position. The JWV must be judged by its position, year-round, on matters of U.S. policy in the Middle East, just as The Council must be judged by its year-round work to weld a better American society.

Yehudi Menuhin gives about a hundred and fifty concerts a year, in some twenty countries — a schedule that calls for a fantastic amount of hopping from place to place, in the course of which Mr. Menuhin, a student of many subjects besides the violin, keeps his eyes and ears open. The other day, having just returned from a month's tour of Russia, during which he played concerts in Moscow, Leningrad, Kiev, Minsk, Lvov, Kishinev, and Odessa, he was brimming over with notions about Russian musicians, whose sunny natures and secure way of life he expatiated on for our benefit. "Russian musicians are the warmest, most open, most generous group of people you can possibly imagine," he said. "Russians are, of course, traditionally hospitable, but I think there are other reasons for the musicians' warmth. There's the fact, for example, that they spend most of their lives together, from the time they are little children in music school, and that, outside music, their lives offer very few chances for adventure, diversion, excitement, or personal aggrandizement. They achieve a certain position by the time they're twenty-five or thirty, and, once graded, they more or less stay put in a given category — first rank, second rank, third rank, with each rank carrying its own privileges and fees. In short, they have the advantages of a lifelong intimacy and a lifelong dedication to their art, and are spared the hazards to friendship and art of our fierce forms of competition."

Himself a prodigy — his début, in San Francisco in 1923, when he was seven, made him famous overnight — Mr. Menuhin was especially interested in visiting the Central Music School, in Moscow, where four hundred children, ranging in age from seven to eighteen, are enrolled. "There are many such schools in Russia," he said. "Think of what it would mean in this country for a gifted child to be able to study for eleven straight years, without a moment's distraction by his family, by TV, and so on! A violinist particularly needs to be alone, because a violin makes a far from pretty sound while one is mastering it; in a crowded New York apartment house the sound of a child torturing a violin becomes unendurable. Naturally, there are drawbacks to the Russian system. In music, as in every other field of endeavor, the Russians aim for a very, very high standard, to be achieved as quickly as possible by a handful of the most gifted, while the majority of the population is left far behind. The discrepancy in Russia between the peaks of skill and the average of skill is enormous. To speak only of violinists, they have long been notorious as the most narrowly educated of people. Today, because of the increase in the musical repertory through the research of musicologists and the composition of so much excellent contemporary music, the violinist must have a broader approach to his art. In Russia, violinists are only beginning to discover this broader approach. Still, there are indications that Russian musical life is becoming more sophisticated. The success of the Moscow Chamber Orchestra, led by Rudolf Barshai, is a good sign. For the first time, Russia has developed a worthy chamber group. In the past, there have been only the two extremes of brilliant virtuosos and massive orchestras. Russian musicians are learning much from the mechanical infusion of music performed outside the country; one sees them practically swathed in tape from their recording machines."

Music is as much an integral part of the life of Russian cities, Mr. Menuhin told us, as hospitals, schools, and dogcatchers are of city life here. "But this, too, points up the problem of the big gap between the best and the average," he said. "Once one leaves Moscow and Leningrad behind, there's a tremendous drop in quality. A city the size of, say, Butte, Montana, may have more and better music than Butte has, but it's all of a pattern, and the shape of the country's culture is like that of a pyramid having Moscow at the apex, with very little of high quality left below the apex. In this country, we have a remarkable level of orchestral playing in many cities; St. Louis, Dallas, Austin, Seattle, and the rest don't have to surrender their best musicians to New York."

Of all the cities Menuhin visited on his recent trip, Odessa was his favorite. "For one thing, my mother had known the town as a girl," he said. "For another, it's the town that has produced more violinists than any other. The audience at my concert was made up mostly of Jewish people — people who give their sons violins as soon as they're old enough to hold anything — and they knew more about the violin than any other audience I've played to. Besides, I had a personal recollection of Odessa. The city is on the Black Sea, near Rumania. I visited it long ago, with my father. We stopped in at a gypsy camp, and I was fascinated by the gypsy music — by the absolutely natural way the music spoke, by the intensity of it, by the way it imitated bird song and other natural sounds. My father said, 'Why, those are Jewish melodies I used to sing as a child!' He was right, but they were actually, in their origin, gypsy songs. In Odessa, you see, the underprivileged urban Jewish fiddler and the underprivileged wandering gypsy fiddler both hit on the same means of personal expression — a means light and mobile, which they could carry with them wherever they might have to go."
